blackguard ('blægəd), sb. and a. (Written 6–8 as two words, 7–8 with hyphen, 8–9 as one word.) [lit. Black Guard, concerning the original application of which there is some doubt. It is possible that senses 1 and 2 began independently of each other; or the one may have originated in a play upon the other, black being taken with a different sense; it would be difficult to assign priority to either. It is even possible that there may have been a guard of soldiers at Westminster called the Black Guard, or that, as some suggest, the attendants or torch-bearers at a funeral, or the link-boys of the streets, may have had this name.]

The following quotations, including the earliest known, show this uncertainty: they may belong to ascertained senses, but cannot be certainly located:

bladdry, -ie, variant of BLATHERY Sc.

blade (bleɪd), sb. Forms: 1 blæd, 4-5 blad, 5 bladde, blaad(e, blayd, 6 blaid, 3- blade. [Com. Teut.: OE. blæd, neut., (pl. blado, bladu) = OFris. bled, OS. blad (MDu. blat, Du. blad, LG. blad), OHG., MHG. blat (mod.G. blatt), ON. blað (Sw., Da. blad):—OTeut. blado-* (m; perh. a ppl. formation (with suffix -ðo- do:—Aryan -tó-) from OTeut. verbal stem blŏ-*, see BLOW v.[2], cognate with L. flos. The long vowel in ME. and modern Eng. appears to be derived from the oblique cases and plural, blăd-es, blăd-o, made in ME. into blā-des, blā-de. The 15th c. northern spellings blayd, blaid, and Chaucer's dissyllabic blade, bladde, require explanation. The sense-history is notable: in German blatt is the general word for 'leaf,' laub being the foliage collectively of trees; in Norse 'herbs or plants have blað, trees have lauf'; but in OE. léaf is the general word for 'leaf' and 'foliage'; blæd occurs only once, (as it happens, poetically, in the brád blado of the plant of wickedness), and this sense is quite absent in ME., while that of the 'blade' of an oar (also in OE.), of a sword or knife, is frequent. It would almost seem then that the modern 'blade' of grass or corn is a later re-transfer from 'sword-blade'; while in regard to corn, there is some reason to suspect influence of med.L. bladum, OF. bled corn, wheat; at least these were evidently supposed to be the same word. The mod.Sc. 'cabbage-blade' also is prob. not directly connected with the OE.; but Norse influence may possibly have contributed to a retention of the vegetable sense in the north.]

I. Of plants.

1. The leaf of a herb or plant; originally perhaps (as in Icelandic) applied to those of all herbs, while leaf was used of the foliage of trees. Now applied dial. (e.g. in south of Scotland) to a broad flat leaf, as the outer leaves of cabbage or lettuce, the leaves of rhubarb, tobacco, etc.; in literary Eng. only poetically and vaguely for 'leaf.'

blaze (bleɪz), sb.[2] [Appears first in 17th c.; no corresponding form occurs in OE. or ME. But clearly identical with ON. blesi 'white star on a horse's forehead,' MDu. blesse, Du. bles, mod.G. blässe, blesse, all in same sense, from stem blas-, blaz- shining, white; cf. OHG. blass whitish, MHG. blas bald, mod.G. blasz pale. It is possible that the ON. word was adopted in north. dial., and thence passed at a later date into general use; but the Du. or LG. form may also have been introduced as a technical term c 1600.

(In either case the spelling has to be explained: the regular repr. of ON. blesi would have been blese, bleeze; if this occurred in north dial., it would be identical with the northern form of BLAZE[1], and might, like it, be made blaze in the literary language; if adapted from Du. or LG., blaze must be a phonetic spelling.)] blaze (bleiz), v.[2] Forms: 4–5 blas-en, 5 blasin, -yn, 6–7 blase, 6– blaze. Pa. t. and pple. blazed (pa. pple. once in 6 blasen; cf. Ger. geblasen, Du. geblazen blown). [In sense 1 apparently the same word as ON. blása to blow (as the wind, with the mouth, bellows, a trumpet), OHG. blâsan (MHG. and mod.G. blâsen), MDu. and Du. blâzen, Goth. -blêsan (in uf-blêsan to blow up, puff up):—OTeut. blǣs-an*, f. root blǣ-* (Aryan bhlê-*, L. flā-re: see BLOW) with suffixal -s- (perhaps from the present stem) taken into the root. The verb (blǣs-an*) was not preserved in OE., where it was represented only by the derivative sb. blǣs-t, BLAST 'blowing.' The ME. vb. was prob. a. ON. blása (unless direct connexion with LG. or Du. blâsen, blâzen, can be traced). Its later history is confused with that of BLAZON, evidently through associating the infinitive blas-en with the pre-existing sb. blason, BLAZON 'shield, heraldic shield.' The proper senses of blaze and blazon, acted and reacted upon each other in the 16th c.: see senses 3–6, and BLAZON v. 4–6. In later uses of sense 2, there may also be often traced an association with BLAZE v.[1], as if to 'blaze abroad,' were to 'expose to the full blaze of publicity.'] blazon ('bleɪz(ə)n), sb. Forms: 4 blasoun, blasen, 4–7 blason, 5 Sc. blasowne, 6– blazon. [a. F. blason (found in other Romanic langs., as Sp. blasón, Pg. brasão, It. blasone, Pr. blezo, blizo). By Diez and Littré referred to a Teut. word identical either with Eng. BLAZE sb.[1] flame, with BLAZE sb.[2] a conspicuous mark, or with Ger. blasen to blow (BLAZE v.[2]), OHG. blâsô a trumpeter. But the original meaning of OF. blason was not, as these conjectures assume, 'glory' or 'proclamation,' or even 'armorial shield,' but simply 'shield' in the literal sense. This is proved by the earliest quotations in Fr. and Eng., and by the derived OF. sense of 'shoulder-blade.']

ble, obs. f. BLEA sb.; var. BLEE, Obs., colour, etc.

-ble, a. OF. -ble:—L. -bilem, nom. -bili-s, suffix forming verbal adjs., with the sense 'given to, tending to, like to, fit to, able to'; as in sta-bili- 'like, fit to stand.' After consonant stems, -ibili-, as vend-i-bili-, vinc-i-bili-; after stems ending in a, e, i, o, u, -ābili-, -ēbili-, -ībili-, -ōbili-, -ūbili-, as honōrā-bili-, delē-bili-, sepelī-bili-, nō-bili-, volū-bili-. Some of these L. words lived on into OFr., e.g. noble, amable, fleble, meuble; later, these became models for the extensive adoption of others from the Latin of literature. Many of both sorts were from 12th to 15th c. adopted in Eng. from Fr., and here served as models for the direct adoption or formation of others from Latin, a process which has gone on to the present day. By far the most numerous of the -ble words are those in -able. In L., -ābili- adjs. arose only from verbs in -āre; but, in Fr., all pres. pples. in -ant may give rise to an adj. in -able, and as -ant is now the universal form of pres. pple., -able is the universal form of the adj. suffix as a living element; -ible being only a fossil survival in words from L. like horrible, possible, visible, not directly attached to a living Fr. verb. When the verb lives in Fr., a modern adj. in -able has always taken the place of the earlier -ible form, as in vendable, croyable, préférable, for L. vendibilis, credibilis, præferibilis*. But in Eng. there is a prevalent feeling for retaining -ible wherever there was or might be a L. -ibilis; while -able is used for words of distinctly Fr. or Eng. origin, as conceivable, movable, speakable. Hence, where there is a verb in French and English, as well as in Latin, English usage is distracted by conflicting and irreconcileable analogies. Thus in the compounds of -fer, L. fero, Latin analogy requires preferible, referible (Walker, Rhym. Dict.), sufferible; French example gives preferable, referable; Fr. and Eng. analogy sufferable (cf. suffering); Eng. analogy (cf. refer-ring) gives referrable (Bailey), conferrable, deferrable; there is also a mongrel spelling referrible, sanctioned by Dr. Johnson, but defensible on no analogy. So with the variant spellings admittable, -ible, tractable, contractible, partable, -ible. These discrepancies no mere etymological grounds can settle; though their number might be lessened by following French precedent, and extending -able to all words having a verb (with the same accent) in Eng., thus admittable, contractable, corruptable, exhaustable, vendable, etc., leaving -ible in credible, intelligible, legible, possible, etc. See -ABLE, -IBLE. The omission or retention of a final e mute before -able is also to a certain extent optional. In words directly from L. it is etymologically absent, as in excusable, declinable; in words from Eng. (beside cases where it must be orthographically retained after c, g, as peaceable, changeable, chargeable, the latter also in Fr.), there is a prevalent feeling for retaining the e in monosyllables, as tameable, nameable, saleable, which otherwise would have their meaning obscured (e.g. tamable, namable, salable). This produces ambiguity of form in such words as blamable (F. blâmable,) blameable, movable, moveable, lovable, loveable, sizable, sizeable, etc. As much reason can be given and as much authority cited for one spelling as for the other, and until a reform of Eng. spelling is made, the double form of these words must continue. In words of English formation, a final consonant is usually doubled before -able, when doubled in the pres. pple., as clubbable, biddable, deferrable. As to the meaning, Palsgrave (1530) says (p. 302):

'Of every adjectyve partyciple .. in ant may be formed an adjectyve by chaungynge of ant into able, as of muant, muable; honorant, honorable; .. whose signifycacion may serve bothe actyvely and passively, as muable, apte or mete or able to chaunge, or .. to be chaunged; honorable apte or mete or able to honour or .. to be honoured .. In this thyng the french tonge is moche more parfyte than our tonge is, for where as they may forme of every partyciple in their tonge an adjectyve endyng in ble, in our tonge we have none suche, but must nedes use circumlocution by .. apte, mete, or able, and our infinityve mode; save that we have admitted as well adjectyves of the frenche tonge endyng in able and ible, as commendable, visible,' etc.

As here stated, adjs. in -bili-, -ble, were originally active (and neuter) as well as passive. Many of the former exist in Eng., e.g. capable, comfortable, suitable, agreeable, conformable, companionable, durable, equable; but the majority have become obsolete or remain only with a passive force, as in credible, audible, flexible, which is also the only use of -able as a living formative, e.g. bearable, eatable, likeable, preferable, insufferable, saleable. (For exhaustive treatment of these words see F. Hall Eng. Adjectives in -able; London 1877.)

[ME. blend-en wk. vb., appears c 1300, at first in northern writers. Evidently akin to BLAND sb. mixture, and the OE. strong vb. bland-an, ON. blanda (Sw. blanda, Da. blande) to mix: see BLAND v. But the ME. vb. (however the change of vowel may be explained) can hardly have been a continuation of the OE. blandan, since this was all but obsolete already in OE., while blenden was a common word from the 14th c. More probably the latter was an adoption of the ON. blanda (which though originally strong, had subsequently weak inflexions); the change of vowel may also have been due to the ON. sing. present blend, blendr: whether any association with BLEND v.[1] (with which it entirely coincides in forms) or other extraneous influence contributed, does not appear. But later identification with BLEND v.[1] is shown by the occasional use of blynde for this verb also. The 16th c. blenne was either phonetic, like the converse len, lend, or deduced from the pa. pple. blend.]

(An equally satisfactory derivation of blétsian, if it were the original form, would be from blót sacrifice, on OTeut. type blôtisôjan*; but besides that blóedsian actually occurs earlier, the change of ds to ts is phonetically natural, while the reverse is not.) The etymological meaning was thus 'to mark (or affect in some way) with blood (or sacrifice); to consecrate'. But the sense-development of the word was greatly influenced by its having been chosen at the Eng. conversion to render L. benedīcere, and Gr. εὐλογεῖν, which started from a primitive sense of 'speak well of or to, eulogize, praise,' but were themselves influenced by being chosen to translate Heb. brk, primarily 'to bend,' hence 'to bend the knee, worship, praise, bless God, invoke blessings on, bless as a deity.' Hence, a long and varied series of associations, heathen, Jewish, and Christian, blend in the Eng. uses of bless and blessing. Senses 4–6 arise mainly from benedīcere, εὐλογεῖν. At a very early date the popular etymological consciousness began to associate this verb with the sb. BLISS 'benignity, blitheness, joy, happiness,' which affected the use of both words (see esp. senses 7, 8), and led to occasional ME. spelling of the vb. with i, y.

The pa. t. and pple. are now generally spelt blessed, though always pronounced (blɛst) in modern prose; the pple. may be pronounced ('blɛsid) in verse, or liturgical reading. As an adj. blessed ('blɛsid) is now the regular prose form, but the archaic blest is frequent in verse, and traditional phrases as e.g. 'the Isles of the Blest.']

Orig. meaning (prob.), To make 'sacred' or 'holy' with blood; to consecrate by some sacrificial rite which was held to render a thing inviolable from profane use of men and evil influence of men or demons. (The streaking of the lintel and doorposts with blood, Exod. xii. 23, to mark them as holy to the Lord and inviolable by the destroying angel, was apparently the kind of idea expressed by blóedsian in pre-christian times. Cf. also the history of the Latin words consecrāre and sacrificium.) Hence, in historical use:

I. To make sacred, consecrate, hallow.

1. trans. To consecrate (a thing) by a religious rite, the utterance of a formula or charm; in later times by a prayer committing it to God for his patronage, defence, and prospering care, as in to bless food, to ask God's blessing on it (cf. 5).

I could as well have chosen 'plik', and perhaps it is a pity that I did not.' (R. M. Hare, private letter to ed., 18 July 1985.).]

DONOVAN Religious Lang. iii. 25 R. M. Hare agreed with Flew that religious statements were factually empty as statements, but then offered an account of their meaningfulness as what he called bliks, i.e. as principles by which one lives and in accordance with which one interprets experience. Ibid. 28 There may be.. factual assumptions behind the adoption of a blik, even though the blik itself is not an assertion of fact. 1976 Theology July 194 The possibility of varied interpretations.. does not confer a licence on the theologian to adopt that kind of interpretation to which he is drawn by his particular blik on the New Testament.

News* 27 July 96 Nobody in the R.N.A.S. ever called them anything but 'Blimps', an onomatopœic name invented by that genius for apposite nomenclature, the late Horace Shortt. 1926 J. R. R. TOLKIEN in Year's Wk. Eng. Stud. 1924 52 It is perhaps more in accordance with their looks, history, and the way in which words are built out of the suggestions of others in the mind, if we guess that blimp was the progeny of blister + lump, and that the vowel i not u was chosen because of its diminutive significance—typical of war-humour. 1928 GAMBLE North Sea Air Station x. 149 The Submarine Scout non-rigid type. The name was abbreviated to S.S. airships, but they were generally known as 'Blimps'. 1934 Discovery Jan. 14/2 Excellent photographs.. could probably be secured next summer from a small 'blimp' carrying a pilot and a photographer and directed by wireless telephony. 1939 War Illustr. 29 Dec. 538/1 The term 'blimp' originated in the last war, when British lighter-than-air aircraft were divided into A-rigid, and B-limp (i.e. without rigid internal framework). The modern barrage balloon may therefore be classed as a blimp. 1940 HARRISSON & MADGE War begins at Home v. 125 The [barrage] balloons, so suitably called blimps, became a major symbol in the first three months of the war.

blizzard ('blɪzəd). [A modern word, prob. more or less onomatopœic; suggestive words are blow, blast, blister, bluster: the Fr. blesser to wound, has also been conjectured, but there is nothing to indicate a French origin. As applied to a 'snow-squall,' the word became general in the American newspapers during the severe winter of 1880–81; but according to the Milwaukee Republican 4 Mar. 1881, it had been so applied in the Northern Vindicator (Estherville, Iowa) between 1860 and 1870. It was apparently in colloquial use in the West much earlier; but whether Col. Crockett's use of it in 1834 (sense 1) was fig., taken from the stifling blast, or was the earlier sense, and subseq. transferred to the blast, is not determined.]

3. 'A hammer swelled at the eye.' Raymond Mining Gloss. 1881.

bloat (bləʊt), a.[1] Also 3–6 blote, 7 bloate. [The spelling bloat occurs in this sense earlier than in that of next word, with which this is often identified, though in the present state of our knowledge it is safer to keep them distinct. The ME. blote is perhaps identical with ON. blaut-r in the sense 'soft with moisture, soaked, wet'; or from a parallel form blót-*: cf. the ME. vb. blotne, ON. blotna to soften, moisten (see BLOTEN), also Sw. blöt soft, moist, yielding. But it would also answer in form to OE. blát 'livid, pale', though this sense is less likely. Sense 2 recalls ON. blautr fiskr, i.e. 'soft fish', applied to 'fresh' fish, but in Sw. blöt fisk, to 'soaked' fish (Vigf.). Though evidence of actual connexion is wanting, it is conjectured that the Eng. 'bloat herring' is, in some way, identical with these, and means, etymologically, either 'soft (moist) herring', in opposition to 'dried', or else 'soaked, steeped herring', in reference to part of the process of curing the herrings so termed. In Act 18 Chas. II. ii. 'bloated' is opposed to 'dried', and it is explained by Blount as 'half-dried'; but most of the quotations give it as meaning (in actual use) 'smoked', (smoking being an important part of the process). One at least (1613 below) appears to identify it with 'puffed up', and thus with sense 2 of the next word, whereas Sylvester, in 1616, says 'Herrings shrink in bloating'; but moist herrings are naturally plumper than those more thoroughly dried. See also next word, and BLOAT v.[1]] bloat (blǝut), a.[2] Forms: 4 bloute, 6–7 blowt(e, 7– bloat. [Apparently distinct at first (as an Eng. word) from the prec., since the earlier form of that was blote, but of this blout; though of parallel origin, and, since the 17th c., identified in form, and often associated in meaning. ME. blout, blowt, was the regular adopted form of ON. blautr- soft (as a baby's limbs, a bed, silk; see Vigf.); cf. Sw. blöt 'soft, yielding, pulpous, pulpy'. The later form bloat does not answer phonetically to blout, blowt, yet its modern use is largely owing to the 'blowt king' of Hamlet having been printed 'bloat' by editors since Warburton, 1747; G. Daniel had also spelt the word in this way c 1640–50. Possibly BLOAT a.[1] in 'bloat herrings' (found as early as 1602) was in the 17th c. a much better known word than this, and being, rightly or wrongly, identified with it, influenced its form. It is to be noted that BLOAT v., and its derivatives BLOATED, BLOATING, are all of earlier use as applied to the herring, than in senses connected with this word. Sense 2 is a natural enough extension of 1; but it may have been influenced by association with blow, blown; the mutual influence of this and the prec. since 1600, cannot be settled without more definite knowledge of the exact notion at first attached to 'bloat herring'.]

bloat, v.[1] Also 7 blote. [App. f. BLOAT a.[1], with the sense 'to make bloat'.]

trans. To cure (herrings) by a process which leaves them soft and only half-dried. This is now done by leaving them in dry salt on a floor for 24 hours, washing in fresh water, spitting, and smoking them over an oak fire for a period varying from 24 hours to 3 or 4 days, according to the time they are to be kept before being eaten. (Earlier authorities speak of their being steeped for a time in brine before smoking; which has to be remembered in discussing the original meaning of bloat.)

Bloated herrings are opposed to dried or red herrings, which are left in dry salt for 10 days, and smoked for 14 days, whence their deep colour and shrivelled dryness.

Origin uncertain: see Diez and Littré. Cf. OE. blanden-feax, blonden-feax having mixed or grizzly hair, grey-haired, old; also beblonden, given in Bosworth as 'dyed', both from blondan to mix, BLAND v. Hence Du Cange, s.v. Blundus, conjectures the original sense to be 'dyed', the ancient Germans being accustomed to dye the hair yellow.]

2. As an intensive: Very....and no mistake, exceedingly; abominably, desperately. In general colloquial use from the Restoration to c 1750; now constantly in the mouths of the lowest classes, but by respectable people considered 'a horrid word', on a par with obscene or profane language, and usually printed in the newspapers (in police reports, etc.) 'b——y'. Also in tmesis.

[The origin is not quite certain; but there is good reason to think that it was at first a reference to the habits of the 'bloods' or aristocratic rowdies of the end of the 17th and beginning of the 18th c. The phrase 'bloody drunk' was apparently = 'as drunk as a blood' (cf. 'as drunk as a lord'); thence it was extended to kindred expressions, and at length to others; probably, in later times, its associations with bloodshed and murder (cf. a bloody battle, a bloody butcher) have recommended it to the rough classes as a word that appeals to their imagination. We may compare the prevalent craving for impressive or graphic intensives, seen in the use of jolly, awfully, terribly, devilish, deuced, damned, ripping, rattling, thumping, stunning, thundering, etc. There is no ground for the notion that 'bloody', offensive as from associations it now is to ears polite, contains any profane allusion or has connexion with the oath "s blood!'] blow (bləʊ), *sb.*¹ Forms: 5 Sc. and north. blaw, 6 bloe, 6–7 blowe, 6– blow. [First found in 15th c., the earliest instances being Sc. and north. Eng. with form blaw. Origin doubtful.

(The etymology of blow has been naturally sought in the stem of the OTeut. vb. bleuwan*, Goth. bliggwan to beat (which is not related to L. fligĕre), in OHG. bliuwan, MHG. bliuwen, mod.G. bläuen 'to beetle, batter, beat, drub' (whence bläuel a beetle), MDu. and mod.Du. blouwen 'to beat, thrash, drub', now esp. 'to brake or swingle flax or hemp' (whence blouwel a brake for flax). The OE. cognate would have been bléowan*, but of this no trace is found, and it is not easy on any theory to understand its giving rise to a substantive in the 15th c. without ever appearing itself. It is still less likely that an English substantive could be formed from the Du. blouwen or its Ger. equivalent, when there is no such substantive in these langs. ('Du. blowe' in J. is a figment.)

Another suggestion which suits the form and accounts also for the early Sc. and north. English variant blaw, is that this is the same word as BLOW *sb.*², or at least, like it, derived from BLOW *v.*¹ The difficulty is, that, as to the sense, early uses of the word do not indicate any such origin, while historically, BLOW *sb.*² (in its own undoubted senses) is of later appearance. The analogy of Fr. soufflet, also, in which a word for 'a blow with the flat of the hand' arises out of the vb. souffler 'to blow wind', though striking at first sight, proves on examination of the history of soufflet to be merely superficial.)] blue (blu:, blju:), a. Forms: 3 bleu, 3–8 blew, 4 blu(e, bluw(e, 4–5 blwe, 4–6 blewe, 7– blue. [ME. blew, a. OF. bleu, a Common Romanic word (= Pr. blau, blava, OSp. blavo, It. dial. biavo, med.L. blāvus), ad. OHG. or OLG. blâw-:—OTeut. blǣwo-z blue, whence also ON. blá-, likewise adopted in ME. as bla, blo, now BLAE. The corresponding OE. form bláw (or blǽw*) is known only in Erfurt Gloss. 1152, 'blata, pigmentum: haui-blauum', and the derivative blǽwen (:—blâwîno-) 'perseus'. But neither of these survived into ME., where their place was supplied by the adoption of ON. blá, in sense of 'lividus', and of F. bleu in sense of 'cæruleus'. The OTeut. blǣwo- was perh. cognate with L. flāvus yellow (though blôwo-z would be the expected Teutonic form), the names of colours having often undergone change in their application; thus OSp. blavo was 'yellowish-grey'. (The guess that blǣwo- was derived from the stem bliuwan*, Goth. bliggwan to beat, as 'the colour caused by a blow' is not tenable.) The present spelling blue is very rare in ME., and hardly known in 16–17th c.; it became common under French influence only after 1700. In pronunciation, nearly all the dictionaries c 1887 still recognized (blju:), but the more easily pronounced (blu:) was already general in educated speech.]

(see 1 a.); in its transferred sense it originated in connexion with re-unions held in London about 1750, at the houses of Mrs. Montague, Mrs. Vesey, and Mrs. Ord, who exerted themselves to substitute for the card-playing, which then formed the chief recreation at evening parties, more intellectual modes of spending the time, including conversation on literary subjects, in which eminent men of letters often took part. Many of those who attended eschewed 'full dress'; one of these was Mr. Benjamin Stillingfleet, who habitually wore grey or 'blue' worsted, instead of black silk stockings. In reference to this, Admiral Boscawen is said (Sir W. Forbes Life of Beattie (1806) I. 210 note) to have derisively dubbed the coterie 'the Blue Stocking Society' (as not constituting a dressed assembly). The ladies who supported the reform were at first called Blue Stockingers, Blue Stocking Ladies, and at length, about 1790, when the actual origin of the term was remembered by few, Blue Stockings, in later slang abbreviated to Blues.]

bluff, sb.[2] [Belongs to BLUFF v.[1]: analogically with bridle, bit, blind, cover, either the verb or the sb. might come first and give rise to the other; here the accessible evidence is in favour of the priority of the verb, though, in the obscurity of the etymology, certainty is not at present possible.]

bluff, v.[1] [Immediately related to BLUFF sb.[2] 'a blinker for a horse', which, as it appears later than the verb, was presumably named from it, though the reverse is also possible. The etymology is quite unknown: the meaning 'blindfold, hoodwink' does not appear to have any possible connexion with BLUFF a. or sb.[1]; the word is probably one of the numerous cant terms (see BAM, BAMBOOZLE) which arose between the Restoration and the reign of Queen Anne. Sense 2 had certainly originally the same meaning; but it looks as if recent users imagined a connexion with BLUFF a. or sb.[1], and made it mean 'to blindfold or hoodwink by assuming a fictitious bold front'.]

2. In the game of poker: To impose upon (an opponent) as to the value of one's hand of cards, by betting heavily upon it, speaking or gesticulating or otherwise acting in such a way as to make believe that it is stronger than it is, so as to induce him to 'throw up' his cards and lose his stake, rather than run the risk of betting against the bluffer. (Of U.S. origin.) Hence, transf. of other wagering, political tactics, international diplomacy, etc. to bluff off: to frighten off or deter (an opponent) by thus imposing upon him as to one's resources and determination.

blunder ('blʌndə(r)), v. Forms: 4–5 blondren, blundren, 5 blundir, -yr, 5–6 blondre, -er, blounder, blundre, 7- blunder. [ME. blondren; of uncertain origin: a good deal depends upon whether the ME. -on- here, as often (cf. wonder, sunder), stands merely graphically for -un-, or is etymological. In the latter case an explanation of blonder as a frequentative of blond, BLAND v., to mix, would well account for the transitive senses. The suggestion that it is a frequentative from Icel. blonda to doze (Sw. blunda to shut the eyes), suits the intransitive senses, but is otherwise doubtful; cf. however BLUND. Perhaps there are really two distinct verbs, with their later senses affected by each other.]

The original form of the word is also doubtful, though blunket is both the earliest and by far the most frequent. blunt (blʌnt), a. and sb. Also 3 Orm. blunnt, 5-6 blont. [Etymology unknown: found in Ormin c 1200, in a sense which has suggested some connexion with ON. blunda to doze, blunda augum to shut the eyes, blundr dozing, sleep (Vigfusson). It has been proposed to explain the form as a contracted pa. pple. for blunded, blund, ON. blundaðr, blundat; but pa. pples. in -nt from -nd are not found so early as 1200; Ormin has none. And this would hardly give the required sense, since blunda was intransitive in ON., and the pple. could hardly exist there. Other suggestions are that blunt might be some kind of side-form of blind, or a nasalized deriv. of an OTeut. root blut-*, whence ON. blaut soft, weak, mod.G. blosz naked, Fris. blat, bleat naked, OE. bléat wretched. But in the present state of the question these are mere conjectures, having no contact with the history of the word.]

blush (blʌʃ), *v.¹ Pa. t. and pple. blushed, blusht (blʌʃt). Forms: 4-6 blusche, blusshe, 4 blosche, 4-5 blysche, 5 blushe, 6 bluss, 6- blush. (Rare pa. t. in 5 blist = blyscht). [Evidently related to a series of words found in Old Norse and Low German, but not known in OHG. or Gothic, pointing back to a stem blŭsi- from verbal root blŭs-* in sense of 'burn, glow, be red'. Cf. OE. blysian* in ablisian to blush, ablysung, ablysȝung 'redness of confusion, shame', with MDu. blōzen, blözen (from earlier bleuzen), Du. blozen to blush, blos (formerly bleus) blush, MLG. blosen, bloschen; also OE. blysa wk. masc., blysiȝe wk. fem., ON. blys neut. 'torch' (Sw. bloss torch, blossa to blaze, Da. blus torch, blusse to blaze, to blush), LG. blüse flame, blüsen to set on fire, bleusteren to inflame, glow, become red. The nearest relatives of ME. blusche, blosche, blysche, are app. MLG. bloschen, LG. blüsken (Brem. Wb. I. 105): and its antecedent form is perhaps to be found in OE. blyscan, bliscan 'rutilare' (in the Aldhelm Glosses, Mone Q. und F. 355): but its comparatively late appearance in ME., apparently first in the north, its various vowel-forms, and the doubtful relations of the senses, esp. sense 2, all combine to leave the history of the word very obscure. OE. blyscan, bliscan, has also been conjectured to be for blicsian*, from root blik-* to shine, in which case it would not be related to the blŭsi- words, nor to ME. blusche. (The Da. deponent blues to blush, may also be compared.)] bluster ('blʌstə(r)), v. Also 4–5 blostre, 4–6 blustre, 6 blaster. [It is very doubtful whether the obsolete ME. sense 1 has any connexion with the later word in the other senses. With the former Mätzner compares the LG. blustern, blistern 'to flutter or flap the wings in alarm like a frightened dove, etc.', which perhaps may be a parallel onomatopœia. The 16th c. word has evident relations both in form and sense with the verbs BLOW, BLAZE *v.*², and BLAST: cf. especially ON. blástr sb. 'blast, breath, blowing, hissing' with the form blasterand in G. Douglas (= BLUSTERING ppl. a.). Prof. Skeat also compares an East Frisian blüstern to bluster, from blüssen to blow, akin to blasen; and it is worthy of note that the Sc. pronunciation is (blystə(r)). But evidence is wanting as to the actual introduction of the word about 1500.]

board (bɔəd), sb. Forms: 1–7 bord, (4–6 borde), 4–7 boord, (5–6 boorde, bourde, 6–7 bourd, 6 boarde), 6– board; north. 4–8 burd, 4–7 burde, 4 Sc. buird, 6– Sc. brod: cf. BRED. [A word or agglomeration of words of complicated history, representing two originally distinct sbs., already blended in OE., and subsequently reinforced in ME. by French uses of one of them, and possibly by Scandinavian uses of one or both. (1) OE. had bord[1] neut. 'board, plank, shield, ? table', a Common Teut. str. neut. sb., = OFris. and OS. bord (MDu. bort, -de, Du. boord 'board', bord 'shelf, plate, trencher'), MHG. and mod.G. bort 'board', Goth. baurd in fotubaurd 'foot-stool', ON. borð 'board, plank, table, maintenance at table' (Sw. and Da. bord table):—OTeut. bord-o(m*, repr. an Aryan bhṛdhom*, Skr. bṛdham*: see BRED sb. (2) OE. had bord[2] 'border, rim, side, ship's side', esp. in phrases innan, utan bordes, also a Common Teut. sb., orig. str. masc. but often also (by confusion with bord[1]) neuter: cf. OS. bord masc. (? neut.), MDu. bort, boort -de, Du. boord masc., 'border, edge, ship's side', OHG., MHG. bort masc., mod.G. bord masc. (and neut.) 'margin, border, ship-board', ON. borð neut. 'margin, shore, ship-board' (Sw., Da. bord 'ship-board'):—OTeut. bord-oz* side, border, rim. (3) Relationship between these two words is uncertain: Franck suggests that bord[2] is a ppl. form from vbl. root ber- to raise, representing an Aryan bhṛtós* 'raised, made projecting'. But the two were associated and confused at an early date: in most of the Teutonic langs., some of the senses of the masc. word, in ON. and perh. in OE. all of them, have gone over to the neuter. It is certain that the sense 'side or board of a ship' belongs to bord[2]; so prob. did that of 'shield', the original sense being 'rim, limb, or border of the shield'; the sense 'table' is doubtful. (4) The WGer. bord[2] masc. 'border, edge, coast, side, ship's side' was adopted in Romanic, giving med.L. bordus, It., Sp., Pg. bordo, F. bord. In the ME. period, and subsequently, the French use of the word has in return greatly influenced the Eng., so that certain modern uses and phrases of board are really from French. It is also possible that the development in ME. was in some points (see branch II.) due to Scandinavian uses.]

I. A board of wood or other substance. [OE. bord[1]:—OTeut. bordo(m.]

1. a. A piece of timber sawn thin, and having considerable extent of surface; usually a rectangular piece of much greater length than breadth; a thin plank. Rarely used without the article, as in made of board, i.e. of thin wood.

14. a. on board (beside the technical sense in 12 c) has now, in common use, the meaning: On or in a ship, boat, etc.; into or on to a ship. That this expression is elliptical, is witnessed by the fuller form on ship-board (cf. ME. 'within schippe burdez' in 12), and the construction 'on board of the ship', or 'on board the ship' (where it is perhaps often supposed that 'board' means the deck). Hence board-ship used attrib. or as adj.

On board appears to be a later expansion (cf. afoot, on foot) of ABOARD, a-bord, and this to have been taken directly from Fr. à bord, as in aller ou monter à bord, être à bord, short for au bord du vaisseau, in which bord 'ship's side' comes contextually to be equal to 'ship' itself. Similar phrases are used in other modern Teut. langs., as Du. aan boord, Ger. an bord, Sw., Da. om skibsbord. Although on borde occurs poetically in OE., and vpon borde in ME., in sense of 'in, upon ship', these appear to have no historical connexion with the later a-board, which begins about 1500, and on board, which appears late in the 17th c.

boat (bəʊt), sb. Forms: 1–3 bát, 4 bot, 4–5 boot, (4–6 boote), 4–7 bote, 6–7 boate, (6 botte, boitt, 7 Sc. pl. bottes), 6– boat; north. 4–6 bate, 5–6 bait, bayt, (5 pl. bat(t)is). [OE. bát: the subsequent phonetic history in Eng. is perfectly normal; but the origin of the OE. word, and its relation to forms in other languages presents difficulties.

OE. bát (unless onomatopœic) must have been either the regular representative of an OTeut. baito-, (-u-*), or an adoption of a word bāt from some other language. (1) The chief relevant fact in Teutonic is that ON. had also bát-r in the sense 'small boat', whence regularly Sw. båt, Da. baad 'boat'. But the OE. and ON. words were not cognate, since the ON. form corresponding to OE. bát would have been beit-r*, while the OE. form corresp. to ON. bát-r (= OTeut. bâito-) would have been bæt, bét*, giving mod.Eng. beet*. In one of the two langs., therefore, bát- must have been adopted from the other: the accessible evidence is on the whole in favour of its priority in OE. This is further favoured by the actual occurrence in ON. of a neuter sb. beit 'boat' (Hávamál st. 90, etc.), which, exc. in gender, is the required form corresponding to OE. bát, from OTeut. baito-*. It is therefore highly probable that the OE. bát is original, and bátr an ON. adoption of it. (2) In any case the absence of the word from continental West Germanic is remarkable: here an OTeut. baito-* would have given OS. bêt, Du. beet, OHG. beiz, Ger. beisz; an OTeut. bâito-* would have given OS. bât, Du. baat, OHG. bâz, mod.G. basz. No such forms exist; on the contrary, mod.Du., LG. and mod.G. have actually boot: of these the Ger. word is a recent adoption from LG. or Du. boot, found in early MDu. c 1250, the ō of which can be accounted for only by its adoption from early ME., or from Scand., at a date when the á of these langs. had already become (ɔ:). (3) A stem bāt- or batt- must have had an early diffusion in Romanic: cf. F. bateau, OF. batel, Pr. batelh, Cat. batell, Sp. batel, It. batello (Florio), now battello, diminutives from a primitive bāto*, batto (the latter actually used in It. in sense of 'small sea-vessel'), OF. bat 'small boat' found in 12th c.; med.L. had also bātus, battus, the former app. only in English documents, the latter (as well as batellus) continental. But no etymology of these is found in Romanic; on the contrary Diez can only refer them back to OE. bát: this is extremely improbable; and the difficulties are only a little lessened by substituting ON. bátr as the presumed source. Moreover this derivation requires bātus* as the original type, while the form really indicated by OF., med.L., and It. is battus*. Unless the latter could be a neben-form of bātus (cf. It. tutto, beside L. tōtus, Sp. todo etc.), it could hardly have any etymological connexion with English-Norse bát-. A Celtic source has been frequently attributed to both the OE. and Romanic words; but Celtic scholars now know that the cited OWelsh bat, Welsh bad, is merely an adoption of the OE. word. (4) Franck points out that, in MDu., boot fem. meant 'cask', as in mod.Sc. meal-boat = 'cask, barrel, tub', prob. identical with F. botte, Pr. and Sp. bota, It. botte, med. Lat. bota, butta, BUTT; and suggests that this may bear at least upon the Du. and LG. boot: it is true that words of general sense like 'vessel', vaisseau, and specific words like 'tub', have been applied to ships and boats; but besides that no vestige of any such sense as ' cask, tub', etc. appears either in ON. or OE. bát, these last could in no way be connected in form with bota, botta, or butta. (5) The conclusions at present tenable are, therefore, that apparently there was an OTeut. baito-*, preserved only in ON. beit and OE. bát; that the latter was also adopted in ON. as bát-r, and that either from Eng. or Norse the word was adopted in Low Ger. and Dutch, as bôt, boot. But that the Romanic batto, bāto, and its family, arose out of the English-Norse word is very doubtful.]

bocardo, bokardo (bəʊ'kɑːdəʊ). [In med.L. the logical term goes back to the 12th or 13th c. On the question of its relation to senses 2, 3, there appears to be no evidence: the conjecture has been offered that the prison may have been named in jocular reference to the impossibility of directly reducing this mood to the First Figure, or because it was considered an awkward form of the syllogism to get out of. The mutual relation of senses 2 and 3 is also uncertain: so far as the evidence goes, 2 may be a specific use of 3, or 3 a generalized application of 2. If the prison was named from the scholastic term, there would be an appropriateness in the name being first given in Oxford.]

1. Logic. A mnemonic word, representing by its vowels the fifth mood of the third figure of syllogisms, in which the premisses are a particular negative and a universal affirmative, and the conclusion a particular negative, the middle term being the subject of both premisses: thus some M is not P; all M is S; some S is not P.

1674 N. FAIRFAX Bulk & Selv. 53 All bodiship, with those its belongers which make it sensible unto us.

bodken, -kin, variants of BAUDEKIN, Obs., cloth.

bodkin ('bɒdkɪn). Forms: 4 boidekyn, boytekyn, bode-, boydekynne, 4–5 boyde-, bodekyn, 5 boddekyn, 6 boddkynne, botken, -kin, bodkyn, bodkine, 7 (boidkene), 5– bodkin. [Of unknown etymology: the orig. form in Eng. was boydekin, boidekyn, in 3 syllables. The form naturally suggests a dim. in -kin: but no primitive of the required form appears in Eng. or other related language. The phonetic history is also difficult.

(In default of finding it elsewhere, the derivation has been sought in Celtic. The Welsh bi'dogyn 'little dagger', fixed on by some, must be discarded, both because it is accented on the penult, and because the ME. word was itself adopted in Welsh as bwytkin; but some still think it possible that boydekin may have originated in some kind of corruption of Ir. bideog, Gael. biodag, Welsh bidog dagger.)] body ('bɒdɪ), sb. Forms: 1 bodiȝ, 3 bodiȝ, 3–4 bodi, bode, 3–7 bodie, 4–6 bodye, 6 bodey, 3– body. [OE. bodiȝ neut., elsewhere in Teut. only in OHG. potah, botah, MHG. botich, -ech, potih str. masc. 'body'; cf. mod.Bav. dial. bottech the 'body' of a chemise, Grimm. The word has died out of Ger., its place being taken by leib, orig. 'life', and körper from Lat.: but, in Eng., body remains as a great and important word.

Since Ger. botah, potah, with final h, is not the exact phonetic equivalent of OE. bodiȝ, there is ground for supposing that the word has been adopted in both from some foreign source. E. Müller connects botah with botahha fem., mod.G. bottich masc. 'cask, tub, vat', identified by Wackernagel with med.L. butica = Gr. ἀποθήκη. But there does not appear to be any clear way of connecting the two words. (Fick's conjectural derivation from bhadh 'to bind' is out of the question. Gaelic bodhaig is from Eng.)]
